Q: Making session objects readable In our project we use session objects to communicate with each other between the threads. We want all the session objects to be visible for all the threads, so we put all the session objects in a static class object. But if we write some code to access the static object, it cannot be accessed by all the threads since they will make an instance of the static object on their own. So we put them into ThreadStatic and mark them volatile. The problem is that a class other than the static one may also require the session object. How do we overcome this issue? A: If you need the same session in several threads, then you need to: make them static put the data in a static variable. However, this approach will lead to a non thread-safe data structure. If you are OK with this, then it's ok. Otherwise, use some form of synchronization (e.g. lock or a producer/consumer queue) between your threads. A: In terms of general OO design, I would encourage you to look into the topic of "Static Classes", as well as how best to manage concurrency in .NET.

Q: Most optimal way to search for routes on Google Maps Android API v2 I'm trying to find the best way to search for routes on Google Maps Android API v2, and then display it. I've found the solution below to be the most efficient one so far: It is pretty good, however I found that when you create multiple markers, the map gets laggy, and the listView gets empty since the map doesn't load. Then I tried using a GoogleMap to load the markers instead, but there seems to be no way of passing a List of markers, so I just load them all at once and then remove them after they are all populated.
